(FOR HOMEWORK AND CLASSWORK)

After you have learned about a historical topic, either from a class lecture/activity or from homework, you will be asked to process what you have learned on the left side of your notebook. The purpose of this is for you think about the information you have just gathered and do something with it. You have creative liberty with this output; the list below is simply a guide to help you. You can do other things to show how you are processing the information.

OPTION 1: Headings (from textbook readings only)

Record all of the sections titles. Headings and subheadings and then rename them based on what the section is about (it should demonstrate that you read the section and understand the importance) or create a question out of the heading that can be answered based on the text. If you create a question, be sure to answer it.

EXAMPLES: Actual title – new title/ question

Women, the constitution, and public policy

-Banding against a patriarchy

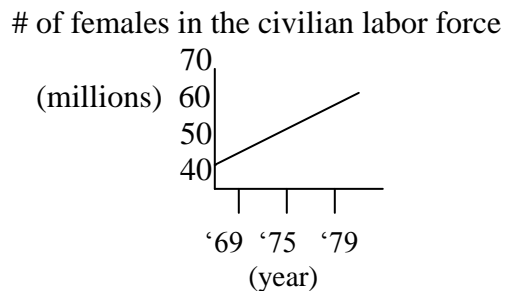

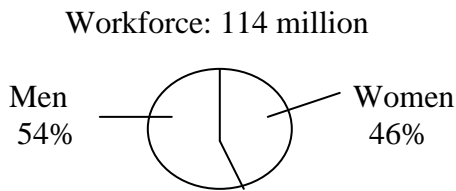

Women in the work place

- At what expense, do most say, equality will come? The loss of protectionism

OPTION 2: Graphs, tables, and charts

Create your own graph, table, or chart based on information in the text or based on analysis of a graph, table, or chart in the text.

EXAMPLES:

OPTION 3: Connections

Create an analogy, metaphor, or simile regarding the text or make personal connections to the text.

EXAMPLES:

Metaphor: The home is a prison in which women (the prisoners) must stay while the men (guards and gatekeepers) keep them in their place.

Personal connections: “ This section of the book was very important to me, especially being a young female. I feel as if America has made a huge effort compared to other countries in regard to women’s rights. I feel very lucky that I will have the opportunity to have my own career and not have to depend on a man. Equality is huge and I commend the women who were brave enough to stand for our rights. This is just one step towards making America shine and be an awesome country.”
